1. How do I organize my analysis paragraphs? What do I choose to analyze first?

A tip when writing analysis is to always check out on the most important devices to analyze. For example, in Malala's speech to the UN, there are several rhetorical devices she uses, like imagery and repetition. But if you concentrate your speech on three lines of repetition compared to the whole speech, you're going to get points off because rhetoric accounts for the entire delivery and a snippet of speech usually can't demonstrate what entire purpose of the speech is. When organizing for thesis statements, it's most important to clarify what choice is involved in the device you are to analyze. It's important to not keep this narrow though, you need to describe what is being demonstrated but keep it free for how it is demonstrated. For example, if you're analyzing diction, you could mention what connotation the diction has for what effect but still leave yourself free in your body paragraphs to analyze what different diction choices there are. Diction could be utilized when the speaker addresses her audience or when the speaker describes a scenario. This'll help you address nuance in your analysis while also keeping transitions smooth.

When you're choosing what to analyze first, you also need to keep in note of transitions. If it could fit the context of the rhetoric you're analyzing, that would work even better. For example, if you were writing analysis on MLK's Letter from Birmingham Jail, it'll be great if you organized your points of analysis based on what MLK transitions from in his speech. He begins by explaining his protests and how they're harmless, and then to admonishing his intended audience (who he suggests as the "white moderate") for their incompetence or blatant refusal to help.

2. What verbs should I use in my magic sentences? (T.S., thesis)

Always remember to Google or Bing so you'll be familiar with suitable verbs. That being said, here are some verbs I recommend that usually does the trick:

Develops: Works really well in the context that the speaker performs some sort of buildup in their rhetoric to prove their argument. It also can help you organize your essay or paragraph based on how the speaker develops the device you're analyzing. (the same goes for verbs such as compare, contrast, narrates, illustrates...)

Assert/Advocate: Make it clear the speaker's stance on the topic and gives you a little leeway for a bit of blandness because the words themselves don't sound as bland.

Emphasize: Simple and easy, but this one fits more into T.S. than thesis (although it would work depending on what emphasis you mention in thesis)

Any other case, use/utilizes would also work for T.S., just try to not repeat these words.
